N

N (en), the fourteenth letter of the modern, and thirteenth of the ancient Roman alphabet, represents historically, and is in form derived from, the Greek nû and the Semitic nun. It usually denotes a voiced nasal consonant with front closure (the point of the tongue touching the teeth or the fore part of the palate). The sound is in certain positions a sonant or vowel, here denoted by ('n), as in bidden (bi·d'n). It is silent only in a few cases at the end of syllables after l and m, as kiln, damn, hymn, column, etc.

Before (g) and (k), n may also represent a nasal with back tongue-closure, here denoted by (ŋ), as in finger (fi·ŋgəɹ), think (þiŋk). When not followed by these sounds this back-nasal is expressed by the digraph ng as in hang (hæŋ), etc.

In ME. the n of the indef. article an is often transferred to a following word beginning with a vowel, as in newt, nickname. A similar transference takes place with the n of min, myn my, and þin, thyn thy: see NAIN, NAUNT, etc.
